

What Christians are fighting against today, then, is not yet another sexual innovation peculiar to our “enlightened age,” but the return to pre-Christian, pagan sexual morality. In ancient Rome homosexuality was just as widespread among the Romans as it was among the Greeks. The Romans had adopted the pederasty of the Greeks. There was nothing shameful about such sexual relations among Romans, if the boy was not freeborn. Slaves, both male and female, were considered property, and that included sexual property. But the Romans also extended homosexuality to adult men, even adult free men. And it is likely that this crossing of the line from child to adult, unfree to free—not homosexuality as such—was what affronted the more austere of the Roman moralists. History of homosexual marriage in ancient Rome gives a clearer understanding of what is at stake. As is the case today, it appears that the incidence of male-male marriage followed upon the widespread acceptance of homosexuality; that is, the practice of homosexuality led to the notion that, somehow, homosexual unions should share in the same status as heterosexual unions. The first-century A.D. catechetical manual, the Didache, makes refreshingly clear what pagans will have to give up, in regard to Roman sexuality, once they entered the Church. It begins with the ominous words, “There are two ways: one of life and one of death—and there is a great difference between the two ways.”

The pagan converts are then confronted with a list of commands. Some of which would have been quite familiar and reasonable to Romans, such as, “You will not murder” and, “You will not commit adultery” (although for Romans, abortion wasn’t murder, and a husband having sex with slaves or prostitutes was not considered adulterous). But then followed strange commands (at least to the Romans), “You will not corrupt boys”; “You will not have illicit sex”; “You will not murder offspring by means of abortion and you will not kill one having been born.” Against the norm in Rome, Christians must reject paedophilia, fornication and homosexuality, abortion, and infanticide. The list also commands, “You will not make potions” a prohibition against widespread practices in the Roman Empire which included potions that stopped conception or caused abortion. The Roman elevation of sexual pleasure above procreation, and hence outside this tightly-defined area of sexual legitimacy defined by Christianity, led to the desire for contraceptive potions, abortifacients, and infanticide. It also led to seeing marriage as nothing but an arena for sexual pleasure, which in turn allowed for an equivalency of heterosexual and homosexual marriage. The Theodosian Code, drawn up by Christian emperors in the fifth century, A.D. made same-sex marriage illegal (referring, as precedent, to edicts published under fourth-century emperors Constantius II and Constans). We can see, then, that Christians face nothing new in regard to the push for gay marriage. In fact, it is something quite old, and represents a return to the pagan views of sexuality that dominated the Roman Empire into which Christianity was born.

“Modernity has been marked by an excessive anthropocentrism...Often , what was handed on was a Promethean vision of mastery over the world, which gave impression that the protection of nature was something that only the fainthearted cared about. Instead, our “dominion” over the universe should be understood more properly in the sense of responsible stewardship”. (from Laudato Si by Pope Francis)

Snapshots from last weekend

Sunday devotions (Holy Rosary, Divine Mercy, Litany to Our Lady) . 4pm –4:30pm

The striking things about today's Gospel passage is that we see Jesus dealing with an unplanned event. He and his disciples had planned a couple of quiet days together in a deserted place. They probably got food three or four days , put it in the boat, and happily sailed off. But when they arrive, a crowd is there waiting for them. It's like parents planning to go up north for a few days, and one of the youngsters gets sick . . . and you know the rest of the story. That set me thinking. I wonder what percentage of our lives is made up of unplanned events. To get a hold of this, let's start out by brainstorming the kinds of unplanned events that are common in people's lives. Let me hear from you some examples of the kinds of things that are unplanned in most people's lives.- Sickness. That's true. We don't sit down and plan to get sick.- Death. I read recently that about 50% of deaths are unexpected.- Automobile accidents. True. We don't sit down and say, "I think I'll get into a car accident next Tuesday.- Alcoholism. You don't hear someone say, "I'm going to grow up and be an alcoholic." It's not something anyone intends in advance.- Re-locating to another city. Most relocations are decided by the company you work for.- Pregnancies. Well, that can be. Actually, when you think about it, you and I didn't plan our own birth. We didn't plan to be born, or to be born at this time in the world's history, or in this place on the globe, or with the genetic make-up we have. We ourselves had no way of designing it or anticipating it. Our whole existence is, from our own point of view, an unplanned event.- Divorce: Of course. The divorce was not part of the marriage plans.- Some homilies! Well, I'd have to say that I've heard some homilies - and given some homilies - that sounded like they were unplanned.- Arguments. Sometimes you're in the middle of an argument and you wonder how it got started in the first place.- Theft. True enough. You don't plan to get robbed.- Losing something. You might plan to lose weight, but you don't plan to lose the car keys. Well, that gives us some ideas. All in all, what would you say - 25 per cent of our lives is made up of unplanned events? Or is it higher than that? I'm not sure. But there are a lot of them.
